Except for special occasion, Americans are not big gift-givers. There's no exchange of presents among business people, and in fact, if one American gave another a present, it could look like an attempt at bribery. Americans have learned something of the role that gift-giving plays in certain cultures, but among ourselves we don't see the need for presents.

Even friends may never exchange presents. When I go aboard, I try to bring back little souvenirs for close friends, but nobody would feel upset if I didn't. I rarely remember a friend's birthday, and few people outside of my family remember mine. If someone gave me presents too often, I would get annoyed. However, a gift from a foreigner—typical of his or her homeland—wouldn't go wrong, except to government employees who aren't allowed to accept gifts.

You usually open a present immediately and in front of the person who gives it. The only exceptions to this are Christmas, birthday, and wedding presents. The best reaction is the delight at receiving something so lovely / indispensable / thoughtful.

You may want to bring a bottle of wine or flowers to a dinner party, but you are never expected to. Nobody will mind if you bring wine, but your host may not serve it that evening.

Christmas is the one occasion when we give gifts to our family and sometimes our friends. We also give gifts to people who have been helpful during the year – doormen, babysitters, housecleaners, newspaper deliverers – anyone who has served us regularly.

37. It is not acceptable to exchange presents with business people because _____.

- a. It is against the law
- b. They are already well-paid
- c. You could be suspected of dishonesty
- d. It is not a business tradition in the U.S.

39. At Christmas, it is customary to give presents to _____.

- a. business colleagues
- b. members of the family only
- c. close friends and family only
- d. people who have served you during the year

40. You can bring a bottle of wine to dinner party, _____.

- a. but your host will feel obliged to serve it with the meal
- b. but you may embarrass your host
- c. and your host will be delighted
- d. but it is not expected

41. In the writer's opinion, gift-giving in the U.S. is _____.

- a. culturally unacceptable
- b. only acceptable at Christmas
