John: Hello. We arrived this morning. I'm a _____ here with my mum and dad, and my sister.

Receptionist: Oh yes, I remember. John, isn't it? How can I help you?

John: It's our first time here in Moscow and we want to do some _____ this afternoon. Can you give me some information about things to see, please?

Receptionist: Yes, certainly. I can give you a small street _____. Here it is. We're here ... and the tourist information centre is ... here. It's not very far. You can easily get there on foot.

John: That's perfect. Thank you. Do you have a guidebook? My mum and dad like having a guidebook. My sister and I think _____ are boring – we think it's much more fun to use the _____ to read about things to do in a city.

Receptionist: Yes, we have some guidebooks here. You have to pay for them, though.

John: OK, I'll tell Mum and Dad. Oh, and do you have a metro map?

Receptionist: Yes, look. It's on the other side of the street map. The best way to get around Moscow is by _____ or by _____. You can get _____ for both.

John: What about taxis? Aren't they quicker?

Receptionist: Taxis are OK, but they can be _____ and quite _____. There's always a lot of _____, so they often take a long time!

John: Thank you. That's really useful information for mum and dad. Bye.

Receptionist: Goodbye ... Oh, excuse me. You left your _____.

John: Pardon?

Receptionist: Isn't that your suitcase there on the floor?

John: No, that isn't mine. Mine's in our room. I saw a man here at the desk before me. He had lots of _____. Perhaps it belongs to him. He went up in the _____.

Receptionist: Ah yes. I remember. I'll call his room. Thank you.
