Text

The concept of traditional households has evolved over the years. In the past, many families adhered to the idea of a housewife managing domestic duties while the husband worked outside. However, modern households often divide responsibilities more equally. This shift depends on changing convictions about gender roles and societal expectations.

Some still object to the idea of shared responsibilities, citing tradition. But others voice their support for a more active involvement of both partners in family life. Domestic violence and exploitation are prohibited by law, ensuring that households become safer spaces. Eligible individuals are encouraged to take part in community programs that promote equality and spontaneous interactions, fostering harmony.
