People are more socially disconnected than ever, experts say. For example, over the past several decades, attendance at clubs and civic associations in the United States has decreased. Also, people don't visit with friends as much as their parents and grandparents did. Such trends may have a bigger impact on people's everyday lives than one would expect.

Social connections can be beneficial in surprising ways. For example, areas where people know their neighbors' names have a lower crime rate than areas where people don't interact with one another. People's mental and physical health also depends on connections with others. According to some studies, having strong social relationships can increase your chances of survival by 50 percent. Furthermore, having enduring relationships can reduce stress and deter feelings of loneliness, both of which can have negative impacts on health.

Some experts say that it's the quality of social relationships that is important, not the quantity. These experts suggest strengthening the close relationships you already have, instead of trying to build a lot of new connections with strangers.

Social connections can enhance our lives if we take the time to be connected in meaningful ways, much like our parents and grandparents did in the past.
