1. Carol is a lecturer at a college in England for people needing to learn English as a second language. In other words, they're mostly members of immigrant families who have come to live and work in the UK. The courses they follow involve learning everyday language for activities such as making doctors' appointments, renting a house or flat, filling in forms and applying for jobs.
2. There are a number of advantages to living in a hall of residence as opposed to a student house: most importantly, meals are sometimes provided and you have a lively social life. If you like organising people, you can become a member of the hall committee and thereby get a place in hall for three years!
3. Students are required to attend lectures and tutorials, report to their personal tutor on a regular basis, hand in coursework as part of the process of continuous assessment and prepare for end-of-year exams. Resits are held every September before the start of term. Help and advice regarding accommodation, choice of career or further study is available from the Student Advisory Centre.

4. David had never considered having a job as a gardener. He'd always imagined himself working in a bank or becoming a maths teacher – he liked numbers. However, after a summer job in an office, he realised he couldn't stand being indoors all the time. He managed to get a place on a landscape gardening course at college and now he's outdoors all day long!
5. When you're applying for a job, remember to think about it carefully beforehand. Ask yourself questions such as: does the job involve doing shift or outdoor work? What are the conditions of work? Is there much overtime? Also pay attention to your letter of application and use correct, formal language. It's important to make a good first impression in this way.
6. Wendy set up a successful business from her home after she was made redundant two years ago. With a young family to look after, it suited her better anyway. Sometimes she stops to think of the days when she was a full-time employee working from nine to five and she thanks her lucky stars that she can now work whenever she chooses.
7. There is a phenomenon known as the eternal student: that is someone who avoids getting a job by taking an unusually long time over their studies. Quite often, these people still haven't decided what to do with their lives even in their thirties. They are very clever at making excuses for this behaviour, but in the end they only deceive themselves.
