The internet represents the biggest explosion of data in human history. The information 26 _____ (system) is a bit like a tropical rainforest: luxuriant, dense and fiercely competitive. As such, it contains its fair share of predators and poisonous plants. Deliberately misleading articles, websites and social media posts can come about for lots of different reasons: they might be trying to influence elections or policies; they might represent a form of cyber warfare between states; they might be aimed at raising someone's profile and influence, or 27 _____ (credit) their opponents. Or they might simply be about making money, relying on the attention-grabbing nature of outrageous lies to generate ad revenue. They noted 28 _____ (propagate) tends to use abstract 29 _____ (general) like "truth" and "freedom", and intriguingly showed that use of the second-person pronoun "you" was closely linked to fake news. For me there's an interesting correspondence with certain kinds of political rhetoric here. The language of 30 _____ (fake), with its powerful subjective statements and focus on anxiety, has something in common with that used by populist leaders. Their style, which often involves "adversarial, emotional, patriotic and abrasive speech" should put us on our guard too.
