My sister, my father and I all work in the fashion industry. My father used to work as a(n) <sup>1</sup>instructor / journalist / biologist for an online news channel before he decided to change career completely. He left the news channel and trained to be a(n) <sup>2</sup>hairdresser / politician / accountant at a local salon. He spent two years learning how to cut hair and loves his new job. I work as a(n) <sup>3</sup>instructor / researcher / accountant for a big fashion company. I interview people and read lots of articles to find out what clothes people will buy in the future. My sister also works for a fashion company as a(n) <sup>4</sup>politician / biologist / admin assistant. She works in the office and spends a lot of time writing letters and emails, but she wants to do something more challenging. ### READING

We have seen many changes to the traditional office environment recently. Futurists predict that flexible hours, with people working from home most days will increase in the future. People will use the office as a meeting place and a centre for company culture, where they will socialise and exchange ideas with their colleagues, while they will actually do the majority of their work at home. The technology already exists for people to attend meetings, share documents and hold conferences online, so the daily journey to the office will no longer be necessary.

Reduced numbers of employees in the office will mean that there is no need for one large office building based in a city. Instead, companies will join together to provide smaller 'hubs' in local towns, where employees can move from one desk to another, work alone or with others and also build relationships within the community. This will save money for companies as well as saving time for employees.

The traditional view of one career for life is also changing. Today, people are more likely to change jobs and learn new skills. As people move more from one job to another, companies will want to show that their workplace looks after their employees. They will focus not only on what their employees are doing, but also how they feel.

Home vs office: the facts:

45% of people who work from home say they love their job.

24% of people based in an office say they love their job.

66% of workers think they can achieve more when they work from home.

74% of workers say they prefer to work flexible hours.
