After weeks of anticipation, the day of the marathon had finally arrived. As the runners took off, the spectators cheered them on.

The first few miles were tough, but the runners pushed through the pain and kept going. As they approached the halfway point, the sun began to beat down on them, making the race even more challenging.

Despite the difficult conditions, the runners dug deep and continued to put one foot in front of the other. Some runners even began to hit the wall and slow down, but others found their second wind and picked up the pace.
