READING: The Wild Urban Adventures of Miss Emily

Emily grew up in the quiet village of Cornville, where cows outnumbered people and the Wi-Fi signal was mostly imaginary. Her days were filled with chasing chickens, climbing trees, and dodging her grandma’s flying slippers. But Emily dreamed of city life—shopping malls, bubble tea, karaoke, and a university that didn’t involve sitting under a banana tree.

One day, she packed her suitcase (mostly instant noodles) and hopped on a bus to the big city. The moment she arrived, she was greeted by honking cars, neon signs, and a man dressed as Pikachu handing out dental flyers. Her cousin Lily picked her up on a motorbike, and Emily clung on like a terrified backpack as they zoomed through the chaos.

Her first trip to the shopping mall was a comedy show. She screamed on the escalator, mistook mannequins for real people, and bought jeans with holes, asking, “Did they forget to finish sewing?” She tried sushi, pizza, and cheese foam tea, which she described as “weird but fancy.” City life was strange—but exciting.

At university, Emily got lost on day one and accidentally made a robot dance to “Gangnam Style.” She misunderstood “submit to the cloud” and looked up at the sky. Her study group mostly studied memes, but she learned how to use Google Docs and how to survive cafeteria food. She was adapting—one awkward moment at a time.

After a roller skating disaster that ended in a fountain, a bush, and a balloon vendor, Emily landed in the hospital with a sprained ankle. But even there, she took selfies and captioned them, “Urban life is wild.” Months later, she was thriving—navigating subways, sipping bubble tea like a pro, and telling hilarious stories to her village every time she visited. From farm girl to city queen, Emily had made it.
