- Exercise 2: Cambridge B1 Preliminary for Schools Reading Part 4
- Exercise 4: Cambridge B1 Preliminary for Schools Reading Part 3

Have you ever swapped a game, a book or any of your possessions with a friend? ¹ D

Thousands of years ago, before money was used to trade things, bartering was popular and had many advantages. If one person had too many eggs and another had more milk than he or she needed, then it made sense for them to barter the items before they went off. In the winter, when many communities were cut off from each other, it was also much more useful to barter goods in exchange for fresh food than for gold or silver. ² ____

However, bartering only works when the things wanted and offered by two people are the same. When three or more traders are required, it becomes complicated and needs more discussion. So as transport and communication became more reliable and the use of money more common, bartering became less important and popular. ³ ____

But in this century, bartering has returned. Many websites and apps have been set up to enable people to exchange goods, services and even their homes. TradeMade is a popular app in the USA. ⁴ ____ For example, someone could offer French lessons in exchange for some concert tickets, or trade some home-made jewellery for some gardening work.

There is little doubt that the new barter economy has been made both popular and possible by social media and phone apps. But that isn't the whole story. ⁵ ____ Increased unemployment has also led to people having less income, but more time to offer to others. But it could also be argued that bartering nowadays gives people something they have been missing: a chance to connect with one another, to share their skills and to feel a part of a community. ⁶ ____
