They can share information, organize campaigns, and put pressure on related departments. Twitter has given the man and woman on the street the power to make a difference.

Identifying the source of a piece of news

It's good to get an idea of the background of a person who says or writes something. Are they an impartial expert or someone who wants to change your opinion to suit their own agenda? For example, this statement about a flu epidemic, "Patients can already spread the virus a day before they've even fallen sick themselves", is more likely to come from a doctor than a politician. On the other hand, "We have to stop people who are carrying the virus from getting into the country" is more likely to come from a politician. (5) _____, you're better able to decide how much importance to give it and whether you can really trust what they say.
