CULTURAL PHENOMENON

Bad Bunny's SNL 'Chavo del Ocho' skit, explained: Learn about the iconic TV show behind the viral moment

For Latinos, this was a moment of recognition, nostalgia, and cultural validation

When Puerto Rican superstar Bad Bunny returned to host Saturday Night Live, fans expected plenty of laughs, music, and cultural nods. Nobody quite anticipated an emotional trip back to one of Latin America's most iconic shows: "El Chavo del Ocho."

In the skit, Bad Bunny played Quico, the spoiled but lovable child known for his sailor outfit and exaggerated pout, while SNL cast member Marcello Hernandez played the beloved orphan El Chavo. For Latinos, this was a moment of recognition, nostalgia, and cultural validation. For non-Latino viewers, it may have just looked like a quirky reenactment.

If El Chavo del Ocho doesn't ring a bell, or you didn't grow up with it, don't worry. Here's what you need to know about the show that defined an era of Latin American television.

Reading And Understanding

The Legacy of 'El Chavo del Ocho'

To understand the skit's roots, it helps to know what 'El Chavo del Ocho' represents for generations of Latinos. Created by Mexican comedian Roberto Gómez Bolaños, better known as Chespirito ("Little Shakespeare"), the sitcom first aired in 1973 and quickly became a cultural phenomenon.

The story centered around El Chavo, a poor orphan who lived inside a barrel in a fictional vecindad, which is a Mexican tenement housing complex. The series followed his misadventures with his neighbors, including Quico, Doña Florinda, Don Ramón, and La Chilindrina.

Despite its simple set and low-budget production, the show resonated deeply because it captured universal themes such as friendship, poverty, pride, jealousy, humor, and resilience.

At its peak, the show had over 350 million viewers per episode across Latin America and Spain. It became a staple of family life, passed down from parents to children, and even dubbed into Portuguese for Brazilian audiences (Chaves). In the United States, it aired on Univision, becoming a touchstone for Latino immigrant households.
