The Power of Youth

A

Melati and Isabel Wijsen are two sisters from the island of Bali in Indonesia. Back in 2013, when Melati was 12 and Isabel 10, they had a lesson at school about influential world leaders, like Nelson Mandela and Mahatma Gandhi, who promoted positive social change. The sisters were excited and went home wondering what they could do. They felt very upset by all the plastic bags floating in the sea near their home, so they created Bye Bye Plastic Bags, a worldwide youth organisation that aims to empower people to say no to single-use plastic. Since then the sisters have organised Bali's biggest beach clean-up ever, lobbied local businesses and spoken at international environmental conferences. The sisters' great determination and their social media skills have helped them make their voices heard. Their dedication was rewarded in December 2018 when the Bali authorities decided to ban single-use plastic, partly a direct result of Melati and Isabel's efforts!

Multi-talented Kavya Kopparapu is a young scientist from Virginia in the USA, currently studying for a degree in Computer Science and Neuroscience at Harvard University. Her interest in these areas began when she attended a school talk about computer science and how it can be used in other disciplines such as medicine. Luckily, she had to study Computer Science at her school, which also offered courses in Artificial Intelligence so she could learn more. She noticed that other schools in her area didn't teach these subjects and that there were more boys in the classes, so she set up the Girls' Computing League to encourage girls to learn Computer Science and to teach it to students who couldn't afford the necessary equipment. It quickly became very successful. Around the same time, she also became passionate about using computer science for good. She developed a computer system which aims to improve the treatment of brain diseases, which is currently being tested!

C

March for Our Lives is an organization led by young people that planned a historic rally against gun violence in 2018 in Washington, D.C., attended by thousands of citizens. In June of that year, these young activists decided to tour the USA on a bus! During their journey round 27 states, they encouraged young people to use their right to vote and campaigned to make them realise that they had a say in influencing change; they wanted the authorities to prohibit people from possessing guns. What inspired these young people to act was the tragic shooting on Valentine's Day, 2018 at the Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida, which they were survivors of. Thanks to the fast work of these young activists and other groups who have taken a stance against the gun laws, the minimum age for gun possession in Florida that was 18 years old at the time has now been raised to 21.

Campbell Remess from Tasmania, Australia, isn't your average secondary school student. He has already set up his own charity, Project 365 by Campbell, which works to find a cure for cancer. It also donates 'Kindness Cruise Holidays' to them to help them cope and recover. Not only has Campbell's father had cancer four times, but this teenage hero has also lost some close family friends to the disease, so he can easily relate to people suffering from it. It all started when he was only nine, when he wanted to buy Christmas presents for children in hospital. Unsurprisingly, his family said he couldn't as there was no spare cash; he is the third oldest of nine siblings. Determined to help, Campbell made teddy bears to give to the children! In addition to winning many local awards for good citizenship and achievement, he has also won the globally renowned American CNN Heroes Young Wonders award. Well done Campbell!
