Now, a note on the British use of the word “right”...

The British use the word “right” like Americans use the word “OK”. You will hear it a lot. Look at the chart below, which lists and explains the many uses of the word.

Usage	British Example	Comparison to American
It is used at the beginning of a sentence to get people’s attention or start an action.	“Right, let’s get started.”	“OK, let’s get started.”
It is used at the end of a conversation to signal that a person is leaving or to close the conversation.	“Right, I’m must go.” “Right. It was good seeing you.”	“OK, I have to go now.” “Well, it was nice to see you.”
It is used to signal comprehension (often with a pause to ensure the listener understands what is being said) or to express agreement.	“Right.” (= “I understand.”) “Right?” (= “Do you understand?”) “Right.” (= “I agree.”) “Right?” (= “Do you agree?”)	“OK.” (= “I understand.”) “OK?” (= “Do you agree?”) “Yes.” (= “I agree.”)
It is used as an intensifier like “very” or “absolute”.	“I’m right pleased with your progress.” “He’s a right idiot.” *	“I’m very pleased...” “He’s a total idiot.”
It is used to change the topic of conversation.	“Right. What do you...” (usually followed by a question or statement to change the topic)	“So, what do you...”
It is used as a synonym for “correct” or “proper”.	“Right.” (= “That’s correct.”)	“That’s right.” (= “That’s correct.”)

* The word “idiot” is a false cognate. It is a very strong insult in Spanish, but in English, it doesn’t have the same weight. English speakers use “idiot” to say that someone is foolish (tonto) or unintelligent.

Here is a sample monologue showing the many uses of the word “right” in British English:

Right, let’s get started. So the word “right” is a word that implies action or understanding, → signals the start (= “OK”)

right? We Brits use it often; it’s a right common word. If you’re talking to a Brit, right, or an → intensifies the word “common” (= “very”) → establishes understanding of what was said (= “Do you understand?”)

Australian, right, you may hear “right” 100 times a day. Most foreigners don’t use the
