Gardens of the Future by Joseph Banks

Some of my friends – they're teenagers like me – think the future will be bad. They feel that there will be too many people in cities and that people won't have enough food to eat. I don't think that's true. Scientists around the world know there's a problem. They're trying to find answers. I often read things on websites that make me feel good about the future.

For example, last week I read about a plan to have gardens on the tops of buildings in the cities. Imagine: big gardens on roofs! These gardens aren't going to be like the ones behind our homes. These gardens will grow up and up like they're on shelves. Think about books on a bookshelf. That's what these gardens are going to be like, but there won't be books – there will be carrots and other vegetables. There will be fruit, too. The people who live in the buildings will learn how the plants grow and how to keep them healthy. These people aren't going to get money for their work in the gardens, but they're going to get something better – fresh food to make good meals for themselves and their families.

- 1 What do Joseph's friends think people in cities won't have enough of in the future?

- 2 Who is trying to find answers to the problem?

- 3 Where does Joseph think people will grow food in the future?

- 4 What type of food does Joseph think people will grow?

- 5 What will people get when they help with the gardens?
