CHICO MENDES

Chico Mendes was a Brazilian labour leader and environmental activist. He was born in 1944 in Xapuri, a small town in the state of Acre, Brazil. He grew up in the Amazon rainforest and worked as a rubber tapper with his family. From a young age, he depended on the forest to live.

As he became an adult, Mendes noticed that many landowners destroyed large areas of the forest. They cut down trees and created cattle farms. This situation affected the lives of rubber tappers, who needed the forest to survive. Because of that, Mendes started to organize workers and defend their rights.

He helped create unions and led peaceful protests against deforestation. He believed that the forest should be protected and used in a sustainable way. He also supported land reform and the creation of protected areas in the Amazon.

During the 1980s, his work became known in Brazil and in other countries. Many people admired his ideas and supported his cause. However, his actions also created conflicts with powerful landowners who wanted to use the land for economic purposes.

Even with threats, Chico Mendes continued his activism. He spoke about the importance of protecting the environment and the rights of workers. He became an important symbol of resistance in the Amazon.

In December 1988, Chico Mendes was murdered outside his home. His death caused international reaction and increased awareness about the destruction of the Amazon rainforest. Today, Chico Mendes is remembered as a hero of environmental protection.
