Green tourism, also called sustainable tourism, is a way of traveling that protects the environment and helps local communities. More travelers today want to enjoy beautiful places without causing harm to nature or local people.

Traditional tourism can damage the environment in many ways. Popular tourist destinations often face problems like pollution, too much garbage, and depleted natural resources such as water and energy. Hotels and restaurants use large amounts of electricity and produce waste. When too many visitors come to one place, they can destroy forests, beaches, and wildlife habitats. Local people may also lose their traditional way of life.

Green tourism offers better solutions. Eco-friendly hotels use solar power and save water. Tourists can choose activities that don't harm animals or plants, like bird watching or hiking on marked trails. Buying products from local sellers helps families earn money and keeps traditional crafts alive. Some travelers even participate in conservation projects, such as planting trees or cleaning beaches during their vacation.

Everyone can practice green tourism. Simple actions make a difference: stay in locally-owned hotels, use public transportation, bring reusable water bottles, and respect local customs and nature. When we travel responsibly, we help preserve beautiful places for future generations to enjoy.
