According to experts, excessive screen time is a significant concern associated with living a virtual life. Moreover, the constant stimulation and distractions of the virtual world can impair concentration, memory, and cognitive functioning. Another negative effect of living a virtual life on young people is social isolation and disconnection from the real world. Many young people become overly reliant on online interactions and neglect offline relationships and activities, leading to feelings of loneliness, anxiety, and depression. Additionally, the online world can expose them to cyberbullying, harassment, and harmful content, posing a threat to their safety and well-being.

To address these issues, young people are encouraged to set boundaries on their screen time, engage in physical activities and social interactions offline, and practice responsible online behavior.
