In today's cities space is at a premium and, as such, more and more (1) _____ flats are being built. In order not to encroach on parks and other green spaces, (2) _____ areas of cities are often targeted for residential developments. Because these areas are less sought after, companies can offer people (3) _____ deals on flats which means young professionals can afford to buy a flat – something which they would be unable to do in other more prestigious areas. These are (4) _____ flats, which means that they are original constructions and not houses which have been converted into flats. Unfortunately, (5) _____ residents can often complain about these new housing developments. In their view, cities are becoming too (6) _____ and this puts strain on key aspects of the infrastructure such as public transport. Some coastal cities are already running out of space to meet their constantly increasing housing needs and are even considering (7) _____ ideas like the construction of floating residential islands. These islands would be located in the sea but connected to the city via bridges and ferry routes.
