The Maori were the first people to live in New Zealand. They came from the Polynesian Islands in huge sailing canoes more than a thousand years ago. They lived in tribes, tattooed their faces, caught birds and fish and made nice objects out of wood. When James Cook and the new settlers arrived, a lot of the Maori died in battles fought over the land. The Maori children had to speak English and the old Maori way of life started to die. In the 1970s things started to change because both the Maori and the Pakeha (the white people) realised they should build the future of New Zealand together. Today the official languages of New Zealand are English and Maori.
