A Mystery at the Museum

Last July, the Miller family was enjoying a long-awaited sightseeing holiday in London. While they were exploring the area near Covent Garden, they decided to visit a famous local gallery. The museum was crowded, and as they were admiring a collection of ancient coins, something unexpected happened.

Mrs. Miller suddenly realized that her small travel bag, which contained their passports and some souvenirs, had vanished from her shoulder. "I didn't notice anyone suspicious," she whispered to a security guard, "but I remember a man in a bright red hoodie standing very close to me just a minute ago."

Fortunately, a young man who was sitting on a bench nearby was a witness. He had noticed a teenager running towards the emergency exit. The police were called immediately and began to investigate the crime. They discovered that the thief hadn't managed to leave the building because the security had already locked the doors. The criminal was caught in the museum café with the bag hidden in his backpack. Although the Millers missed their planned trip to the British Museum that afternoon, they were just relieved to have their belongings back.
