The public transportation system in Japan is known for being clean, safe, and very efficient. Every year, more than 30 billion passengers use different types of transport, such as trains, subways, buses, and ferries, to reach their destinations. The Ministry of Land, Infrastructure, Transport, and Tourism (MLIT) manages the system, but there are also many private companies involved.

To help you navigate Japan's public transportation, there are several useful apps. Google Maps offers real-time navigation and transit information. HyperDia provides details about train schedules and prices. Japan Travel guides you from one place to another using various modes of transport. MAPS.ME allows you to use maps without an internet connection, and Norikae Annai is a popular app in Japan for checking routes and travel times by train or aeroplane.

While these apps are helpful for planning, you usually need to buy your ticket at the station. However, some apps from specific transport companies let you purchase tickets online for certain trains or buses.
