

Exercise 1: Reading and listening.

The Secret Behind a Viral Challenge

Last month, thousands of teenagers around the world joined a social media challenge that encouraged them to spend one weekend without using their phones. Before the challenge had begun, many participants had believed it would be easy, but they quickly discovered that it was much more difficult than they expected.

During the first day, many students realized they had become too dependent on technology. Some of them had forgotten how much they enjoyed reading books, playing sports, or simply talking face to face with their friends. Others said they had spent too many hours scrolling through videos every day.

By the second day, several participants had found new hobbies. Some had learned how to cook simple meals, while others had built small projects, painted pictures, or practiced musical instruments. They also had shared their experiences with their families instead of posting everything online.

Many teenagers explained that they had overcome their fear of missing important messages. They noticed that they had improved their communication skills because they listened more carefully during conversations. Their parents were surprised because the teenagers had shown more interest in family activities.

At the end of the weekend, most students agreed that they had gained something much more valuable than extra screen time. They had developed better habits, stronger friendships, and more confidence. Although they returned to using their phones, they promised to use them more responsibly.

The organizers later reported that the challenge had inspired thousands of schools to create similar activities. Teachers believed the project had helped students understand that technology is useful, but balance is even more important. Many participants said they wanted to repeat the experience with their friends in the future.
