Conclusion

Example answer:

Many people debate whether schools should focus on punishing bad behaviour or encouraging positive actions. While discipline remains necessary, promoting good conduct creates a much more effective learning environment for teenagers.

On the one hand, school rules and punishments play an important role in keeping a school safe and organised. Strict consequences can stop bad behaviour quickly because students wish to avoid them. However, relying only on punishments often creates fear and resentment. More importantly, it fails to teach students how to behave properly in the long run.

On the other hand, positive role models are essential for guiding young people. Teachers and school staff should always set good examples because students learn a lot by observing adult behaviour. When educators treat others with respect, kindness, and honesty, students naturally follow their example.

Furthermore, schools ought to introduce rewards and recognition for good conduct. Rewarding achievements through public praise, certificates, or small prizes effectively motivates teenagers. A supportive environment helps students make better choices voluntarily rather than out of fear.

In conclusion, although rules are important, schools should focus more on encouraging good behaviour through role models and rewards. This approach helps students develop self-discipline and become responsible citizens.
