When Nature Becomes Dangerous

Last summer, a small town near the mountains experienced several days of extreme weather. It all began when dark clouds appeared in the sky and heavy rain started to pour. Soon, lightning flashed across the sky, and loud thunder followed. A strong wind began to blow, and the temperature suddenly dropped.

During the night, a powerful snowstorm hit the mountain area, even though it was unusual for that time of year. In the morning, the roads were covered with snow, and several trees had fallen down. The storm also caused a power cut, so many families had no electricity.

A few days later, the weather changed again. The temperature began to rise, and the snow melted quickly. Unfortunately, the river started to overflow, causing a serious flood in the lower part of the town. Water entered some houses, and the local authorities told people to leave the area.

At the same time, a tornado was reported in a nearby region. It moved across open fields and destroyed several farm buildings. Luckily, nobody was seriously hurt.

After these events, the town decided to take action. Workers began to clear up fallen branches and repair damaged roads. The authorities also warned people not to put out fires carelessly during dry weather because a small fire could quickly spread. They explained that climate change may make some extreme weather events more frequent.

Although the town suffered a lot of damage, its residents helped each other. They understood that people cannot control nature, but they can prepare for dangerous situations and protect their community.

Read the statements. Write T (True) or F (False).
