In recent years, more and more people have moved from the countryside to big cities. They believe that city life offers better opportunities for work, education, and entertainment. As a result, cities are becoming larger and more crowded, while rural areas are losing many young residents who want to build their future in urban environments.

Living in a city has many benefits. People can find modern schools, hospitals, and shopping centres nearby. There are more job options with higher salaries. Public transport, like buses and trains, makes travelling easy, and citizens can enjoy cultural events such as concerts, museums, and cinemas almost every week.

However, city life also has several disadvantages. The cost of living is high, and housing can be very expensive. The streets are often noisy and polluted with traffic and smoke. People may feel stressed, lonely, or unsafe because of the fast pace and competition.

For these reasons, choosing where to live depends on personal preference. Some enjoy the excitement and convenience of cities, while others prefer the peace of the countryside. The best choice is to find a balance between comfort, opportunity, and happiness wherever one decides to stay.
