D. Read the text below, then answer the questions.

The Millennial Generation, people born from 1980 to 2000, has several different aspects from the Baby Boomers, people born from 1946 to 1964. The most significant case is how they see their professional careers. In the old days, working for the same company until you were able to retire was the idea of a good job. Nowadays, for most Millennials what matters in their professional careers is the thrill of getting a new job or a new experience.

The good news for employers is that the best talents are available. Millennials have little sense of employer loyalty. More than 50% of them expect to have between two and five employers in their lifetime and a quarter expect to have six or more steps in their careers. One disadvantage is that the market still sees them as selfish and narcissistic, but researchers affirm that this is because of their highly involved parents' effort, that significantly motivated them to improve their self-esteem.

Most of them are excellent employees and work well in team, but they keep an ambitious attitude, seeking for constant promotions and income raises. They look for a fulfilling profession that gives them a purpose of contributing to their countries, and having some time to rest.
