The Night-Shift Nurse

Most people go to bed when Mai starts work. She is a nurse in a busy city hospital, and her shift begins at nine p.m. and finishes at seven the next morning. Before she leaves home, she always prepares a light meal, because hospital food rarely tastes good after midnight. During the night, Mai checks on her patients every hour, gives them their medicine and writes detailed reports. Although the ward seems quiet, emergencies often happen without warning. When an ambulance arrives, everyone moves quickly and nobody complains about being tired. Mai admits that the job affects her social life: her friends usually meet on Saturday evenings, exactly when she is working. However, she doesn't regret her choice. “Patients remember the person who sits with them at three in the morning,” she explains. “That feeling makes every difficult night worthwhile.”
