Ajisaka

Long ago, in Java, there lived a wise and brave young man named Aji Saka. One day, he came to the kingdom of Medang Kamulan, which was ruled by a cruel king named Dewata Cengkar. The king was known for asking the people to give him humans as food. Because of this, the villagers lived in fear and could not live peacefully.

Aji Saka felt sorry for the villagers and decided to stop the king's cruel actions. He went to the palace and met Dewata Cengkar. "Your Majesty, I have heard about your rule. I want to help the people," he said. Then, he made a request, "I can give myself to you, but please give me a piece of land as large as my headcloth."

The king laughed and agreed because he thought the request was easy to fulfill. Aji Saka then began to spread his headcloth. Surprisingly, the cloth kept getting bigger and bigger. The king followed the cloth across the land until they finally reached a high cliff near the sea. When the king stood near the edge, Aji Saka pushed him into the sea and ended his cruel rule.

After Dewata Cengkar disappeared, the people felt happy and free. They no longer had to give humans to the king. Aji Saka then became the new ruler of Medang Kamulan and led the kingdom with wisdom and kindness. Since then, he has been remembered as a brave hero who brought peace to the people. He is also connected to the story of the origin of the Javanese Hanacaraka script.
