Body language improves communication

Terry Gibbs, a body language expert, explains how body language helps people to communicate.

So, Terry - what is body language?

Well, everybody moves their face and body in different ways. The way people move can show their emotions. Body language is non-verbal. This means that people are communicating information without speaking. A famous study showed that effective communication is 93% non-verbal and only 7% the words you say. Of the 93%, 38% is the tone of your voice and 55% is body language. So, to communicate well you need to understand body language.

And what do you do?

Because I can read body language, I work for people interested in understanding the signals that individuals send. A newspaper will contact me when they want to look into the non-verbal messages that politicians give when they speak on television. Sometimes the words give one message, but the body language says the opposite. I also advise the police when they don't know if a criminal is telling the truth or if a witness is unreliable. Of course, when I'm sitting in the police interview room, I don't reveal to the witnesses that I'm a body language expert. I keep that to myself.

Could you give us some examples?

Yes, for example, a person who is shy doesn't like looking directly in the eye of another person. They often look down, keeping their arms close to their body and their legs together. However, a confident person can maintain eye contact for a long time and will open their arms and shoulders wide to appear bigger. They also walk faster but, when speaking, they often pause and are happy to listen, whereas nervous people can't stop talking.

Can you really tell if a criminal is not telling the truth?

Yes, most of the time. I notice if their attitude changes when we are talking. For example, they might start being friendly and then become more serious as I ask them for more details. And people who give lots of unnecessary details also might be trying too hard to make me believe something. If they touch their face with their hand or put their hand over their mouth, these are good signs that their story might not be true.

Finally, Terry, how can we learn how to read body language?

You need to be interested in people and you have to learn the meaning of many different body movements and facial expressions. For example, I see your head is forward and you are smiling a lot. So, I think you are a curious person and you are enjoying our conversation!

That's so true! Thanks, Terry. For some free information about body language just email the magazine and we will send you Terry's e-book on body language as soon as we hear from you. In a few weeks you will be able to amaze your friends with your new skills!
