HANSON'S BLOG

I enjoyed playing football right from a very young age. When I was a toddler, my football moments were in my garden— just kicking the ball aimlessly with my older brother, sisters, mom, dad or with my grandad. As I grew older with stronger legs, I played with my friends from the neighbourhood. My memorable football days were at both my primary and secondary schools during recess and the waiting time for transport after school. Football became futsal when I frequently played in the classroom when teachers did not turn up. The best of all were the physical education classes at the secondary school field which were mostly football sessions.

Football helped my friends and I to forget our differences and grievances. From young, the game inculcated a deep sense of co-operation. Cheering our school team in both friendly and competitive matches taught us the importance of unity, loyalty, teamwork and a sense of belonging to the school. In fact, I became more diligent at home so that my parents would allow me to stay back for football practice. More importantly, football helped me to develop better social and communication skills. I must admit that I am indeed looking forward to more fabulous football days.
