SETT: The Dream Of Life In Space

People have always gazed up at the stars in wonder. Their imaginations are filled with possibility as they think carefully how large the universe is and whether or not we are alone in it. Of all the stars out there, are there intelligent beings on a planet circling one of the stars looking back at us and wondering the same thing?

It is difficult to comprehend how many stars there are, or even to guess the possibilities of their beings intelligent life. Yet our interest in finding out is so strong that the search has been going on for over a century. What we consider the modern Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence (SETT) began around 1960.

The SETT project is not what many people think it is. A simple explanation is that scientists study electromagnetic waves that are being emitted throughout the universe. When they are looking at these waves, they have a good idea of what are considered natural, random patterns the waves take. Therefore, they are searching for anything that does not appear to be randomly generated. If they were able to find something non- random, they would believe that an intelligent source of some kind must be creating it. In other words, intelligent life would have to exist somewhere else in the universe.

While the SETT project will continue to listen for signals from an intelligent source, other programs hope to find any source of life. The Mars rovers will continue to search for dry lake beds and other area on the Red planet that may have once held life. If any life can be found outside the earth, then we are probably on our way to finding life that could be similar to our own.

1. How long has the search for life in outer space been going on?

2. What are the people in the SETT project listening for?

3. When did the modern search for intelligent life begin?

4. Why are people searching for intelligent life in space?
