Tubal Uriah “Buzz” Butler was a veteran labour leader and a politician. He was born in Grenada in 1895. Butler joined the British West Indian Regiment and fought for world peace and justice during World War I.

He migrated to Trinidad in 1921 to find work in the oil industry. He worked for several years in the oilfields in south Trinidad. Butler ended up with a permanent limp after an accident on the job. Butler organised a “hunger march” with oil workers where they highlighted their plight by marching from south Trinidad to Port of Spain.

Throughout the years, Butler continued to fight for better conditions and salaries for workers. While addressing a crowd in Fyzabad, a riot broke out and Butler was later arrested and jailed. Upon his release, he continued to be active in the political life of the country. Butler was recognised for his contribution to the political and social development of Trinidad and Tobago. He was awarded the Trinity Cross, the nation’s highest award. A statue was erected in Fyzabad and a highway was named in his honour. In 1973, the Trinidad and Tobago Government declared June 19th as Labour Day, a national holiday.
