Paula's blog

It's 9 p.m. on October 2nd, and I'm sitting next to a campfire in the middle of the Atacama Desert in Chile. I'm cooking my dinner over the fire. It's beautiful here in the desert, but it can get very cold at night, so I'm wearing a warm jacket and a hat. My feet hurt, and I'm very tired. Today, I ran nearly 40 kilometers in the desert sun.

It's Day 4 of the Atacama Crossing race, and I'm over halfway through. The Atacama Crossing is a 250-kilometer ultramarathon. You don't have to run all the way, and some people walk it. But everyone has to complete the race in seven days. You also have to carry all your food, clothes, and equipment in a backpack. At the beginning of the race, this can weigh up to fifteen kilograms. Fortunately, you don't have to carry all your water—the race organizers provide plenty of water at checkpoints. We sleep in tents at desert campsites each night. The Atacama Crossing is one of four ultramarathons from the 4 Deserts series. Each of these ultramarathons is 250 kilometers long and takes place in a desert. In July this year, I ran across the Gobi Desert through Mongolia and China, in the Gobi March. Before that, in April, I ran in the Namib Race, which takes place in the Namib Desert in Namibia. The fourth race takes place in the polar desert of Antarctica and is called The Last Desert. In November, I'm traveling to Ushuaia in Argentina, where the race ship leaves for Antarctica. After The Last Desert race, I'm planning a very long rest!

A marathon is a long running race of about 42 kilometers.

An ultramarathon is any running race that is more than 42 kilometers.
