The first humans came from Africa. Then they went to Europe and Asia. This migration took hundreds or maybe even thousands of years. How did humans end up traveling so far from Africa? The answer is simple: they walked. The first humans were hunter-gatherers. They never stopped traveling in search of food.

They hunted animals and gathered the plants that grew there. After all, these early hunter-gathers were not in a hurry! They did not know that they were crossing a land bridge into a new continent. They were simply looking for new sources of food.

Over a long period of time, humans made their way across the land bridge and into North America. From there, they traveled south. As the earth warmed and land bridge disappeared again under the Bering Sea, humans continued to spread across the Americas.
