TIME IN THE GARDEN

Some gardeners don't need watches at work. They just look at their flowers. Telling time by the flowers dates to the 1700s. Scientists of that time already knew that certain kinds of flowers opened and closed at definite times of the day.

This fascinated Swedish scientist Carolus Linnaeus. He studied the schedules of flowers around him. Then he figured out how a gardener could plant a flower bed that would keep time all day long.

Linnaeus made a list of flowers that would open or close at certain times of the day. He chose local flowers that would "perform" on time, even on cloudy or cold days. Years later, an artist drew his version of Linnaeus' idea as a clock face. Each of the 12 daylight hours shows a kind of flower that opens or closes at that time of day

Alberto Santos-Dumont (1873-1932) was born in Brazil and educated in Paris. He made his first balloon ascent in 1898 and soon after that began constructing dirigible airships. In 1901 he won a Paris air race and international fame. (After the race, he asked Louis Cartier for timepiece that would keep his handsfree – the first wrist-watch)

Turning to heavier-than-air machines, Santos-Dumont built his 14-Bis in 1906, three years after the Wright brothers' initial flight. His flight was the first in Europe, and his plane was the first anywhere to lift off the ground under its own power. In 1909 Santos-Dumont designed the Demoiselle monoplane, the forerunner of modern light planes.

In 1910 Santos-Dumont fell ill with multiple sclerosis and retired from flying. He returned to Brazil in 1916. Ill and despondent over the use of aircraft in warfare he committed suicide in 1932.
