A lie detector for the Ecuadorian police!

Ecuador's government is going to make all of its police officers take a lie detector test. The BBC reports that police Chief General Wilson Alulema wants all of the police to take the test since it could help end corruption in the force. It is part of President Rafael Correa's efforts to modernize the force following a police mutiny last year. In September 2010, Ecuador's police mutinied against a law that would have affected their pay and bonuses. They abandoned their posts and left much of the country without protection, which sparked nationwide looting and unrest. President Correa faced the mutineers and challenged them to kill him – a bad idea as his own police attacked him with tear gas and he had to be rescued by the army.

Next month, as many as 42,000 officers are taking the test. General Alulema says it will help stop police officers taking bribes and turning a blind eye to crime. The General said he hoped the test would lead to the sacking of any officer linked to corruption. He pointed to around 300 officials suspended over corruption allegations who were recently given their jobs back. Judges argued there were too many irregularities for a case to be made against them. The BBC reports the General as saying: "Those judges ignore the gravity of their decisions." Governments around the world should closely follow the results of the tests, which might help them consider similar checks on their politicians.

> Read text above and then make questions for	r the underlined words in the correct tense:
1	? Ecuador's government is going to make all of its police officers take a lie detector test.
2	? General Wilson Alulema wants all of the police to take the test since it could help end corr	ruption in the force
3	? In September, 2010, Ecuador's police
mutinied against a law that would have affected t	heir pay and bonuses.
4	? No, the president didn't support the police.
He challenged them to kill him.
5	? Next month, as many as 42,000 officers are taking the test.
6.	? Next month, as many as 42,000 officers are
taking the test.
7	? Yes, it will help stop police officers taking bribes and turning a blind eve to crime.	