MAINTAINING A POSITIVE SELF-IMAGE

The need to maintain a positive self-image is a powerful motivator. Much of our behaviour is directed toward satisfying our own personal standards; for example, if we believe that we are good and honest people, we are likely to engage in honest and good behaviour even when no one is watching, because we want to maintain a positive self-image. If we believe that we are capable and intelligent, we try to perform well in situations which require intelligence and capability.

However, sometimes the realities of life force us into situations where our behaviour and beliefs contradict our positive self-image. For example, in an episode of Candid Camera TV reality show many years ago, a coffee shop distributed sugar packets that could not be opened. The hidden camera recorded many customers trying to open the packets and then deciding that they really preferred unsweetened coffee (exactly like Aesop's fox, who decided that the grapes he couldn't reach were probably sour anyway). One customer, after making an extraordinary effort to open the sugar packet, looked around and then dropped it whole into his coffee! A member of the Candid Camera crew approached the man and asked him why he had dropped the sugar packet into his coffee. The man replied that he always did that, that he liked his coffee that way.

The man in the Candid Camera episode was responding to an embarrassing situation by explaining his strange behaviour, hoping to maintain a positive image in others' eyes (and thus keep his own positive self-image). Similarly, a student who is caught cheating on a test might justify his behaviour by stating (and even believing) that "everyone does it", or denying that he cheated, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary. Highly competitive athletes who are otherwise careful about their health might justify taking muscle-enhancing anabolic steroids by explaining that the drug will strengthen them and, therefore, help bring victory to their team.

In a classic example, a student who usually gets good grades receives a poor mark on a quiz. The mark is inconsistent with her self-image, and causes her discomfort. To resolve this discomfort, she may decide to work harder to make certain that she never gets such a low grade again. On the other hand, she may try to justify her low grade: "The questions were tricky. I wasn't feeling well. I wasn't really trying. It was too hot." All these excuses are directed at avoiding an unpleasant pairing of inconsistent ideas: "I am a good student." and "I did poorly on the quiz, and it was my own fault."

16. The main idea in the first paragraph of the text is that people's behaviour often depends on the image they have of their character and abilities.

- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.

17. According to the writer, only a small percentage of people behave well when no one is watching.

- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.

18. To illustrate his point of view, the writer gives a detailed description of an episode of the Candid Camera reality show.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.
19. One coffee shop customer tried to open the sugar packet with his teeth.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.
20. A male customer is compared to Aesop’s fox for refusing to drink his coffee unsweetened.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.
21. Students who are caught cheating on a test may deny the accusation despite the available evidence.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.
22. It is common for drug stores to sell anabolic steroids to athletes.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.
23. Low grades motivate some students to work harder and make others put the blame on the circumstances.
- A) True. B) False. C) No information in the text.

Directions: Read the text below. Then read the questions that follow it and choose the best answer to each question correspondingly among A, B, C or D, marking your answers on your answer sheet.

A FOUNTAIN OF KNOWLEDGE

Throughout the year, as far as I was concerned, the most important day of the week was the day that Theodore visited us. Sometimes it would be a long family day – a drive down south and a picnic on a remote beach, or something similar; but, normally, Theo and I would set off alone on one of our excursions, as Theodore insisted on calling them. Equipped with our collecting kits and bags, nets, bottles and test-tubes and accompanied by the dogs, we would set out to explore the island in much the same spirit of adventure that drove Victorian explorers to venture into the farthest corners of Africa.

But not many of the Victorian explorers had the benefit of Theodore as a companion; as a handy encyclopaedia to take along on the trip he could not be bettered. To me, he was all-wise as a god, but much nicer since he was available. It was not only his incredible erudition that astonished everyone who met him but his modesty too. I remember how we would sit on the verandah, surrounded by the remnants of one of Mother’s extravagant teas, listening to the tired cicadas singing in the evening, bombarding Theodore with questions. Elegantly dressed in his tweed suit, his blond hair and beard perfectly trimmed, his eyes would sparkle with interest as each new subject was introduced.

“Well,” Theodore would say cautiously, “I’m afraid it’s a subject about which I know very little. But I believe I’m right in saying that...”

During the next half hour he would give an all-embracing and concise lecture on the subject and then end by saying “But if you want an expert opinion, there’s a Doctor X who’d give you much more information than I can.”

It was small wonder that we treated him like an oracle. The phrase “Theo says” set the seal of authenticity and validity on whatever item of information the person was going to disclose. Theodore was everything to everyone. With Mother he could discuss plants, particularly herbs and recipes, while keeping her supplied with reading matter from his big library of detective novels. With my sister Margo he could talk of diets, exercises and various creams supposed to have a miraculous effect on spots, pimples and acne. He could keep pace effortlessly with any idea that entered the enquiring mind of my brother Larry, from Freud to the popular belief in vampires; while Leslie he could enlighten on the history of guns or the winter habits of the hare. As far as I was concerned, with a hungry and ignorant mind, Theodore represented a fountain of knowledge on every subject from which I drank greedily.

24. This is the narrator’s personal story about

- A) his holiday on a remote island.
- B) his quiet and uneventful life.
- C) a scholarly and erudite friend.
- D) his family’s daily routine.

- A) fully equipped with hunting gear.
- B) accompanied by family and friends.
- C) looking for suitable picnic sites.
- D) excited and eager to see new things.

26. What made the narrator’s trips really worthwhile?

- A) The information provided by his companion.
- B) The encyclopaedia he carried for reference.
- C) The equipment he had borrowed from Theodore.
- D) Theodore’s shyness and natural modesty.

27. Despite the breadth of Theodore’s knowledge on every subject,

- A) he avoided answering many questions.
- B) he failed to give the right answers.
- C) he admitted others might have more expertise.
- D) he refused to introduce subjects he knew little about.

28. According to the narrator’s family,

- A) whatever Theodore said was the ultimate truth.
- B) Theodore was afraid to share his real views.
- C) Theodore hated to disclose any personal details.
- D) whatever Theodore said needed to be tested first.

29. Theodore used to

- A) share herbs and spices with Mother.
- B) discuss various ideas with Larry.
- C) cure Margo’s pimples and acne.
- D) talk about his experience with guns.

30. The narrator calls Theodore “a fountain of knowledge” because

- A) Theodore could not help sharing what he knew without being asked.
- B) Theodore knew everything about everyone on the island.
- C) Theodore had the same hobbies as the members of the family.
- D) Theodore could supply all sorts of information whenever asked.
