New study shows link between violent video games and teens' behavior

A five-year-study on the way violent video games affect teenagers' behavior has concluded that teenagers who play more than ten hours of violent video games a week are more likely to get into trouble at home and at school than those students who play fewer or no hours of violent video games. Some scientists are conscious about these findings, however, saying that violent video games are not the only factor that causes teenagers to behave badly.
