Vietnam teens devote more leisure time to cyberspace than reality

A recent survey of 400 students aged from 13 to 19 in Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City has illustrated an 'immense gap' in the lives of urban teenagers and highlighted worrying problems about their conceptions, attitudes, and behavior.

The teenagers in the survey spent the most time within the four walls of classrooms, with little left for sports or community-related activities. Besides the time at school, 92 percent of students said they have 'extra time' for studies at the homes of teachers for two or three subjects, including Mathematics and English.

Lack of career orientation

Regardless of their diligence in their studies, 46 percent of teens said they do not know what type of career path they want to pursue.

It seems that many students consider their studies a duty, instead of a motivation to possess knowledge.

In fact, parents spend less than two hours a day talking with their children. Most of this time is spent at the dining table or watching television.

Sadly, most of these interactions between parents and children are uncomfortable for teens, because they are often reprimanded for their social lives.

Consequently, 30 percent of teens blame their parents for disregarding their needs and desires. Forty percent said they are often intimidated by their parents, and 50 percent admitted that they are shy about telling private stories to their parents.

George is in his mid-adolescence and like many of his peers, he is undergoing great changes in his body as well as his brain. He and his friends are experiencing puberty, an important phase of development of a person when physical and mental changes take place. Boys in particular may find numerous changes within themselves which they sometimes cannot understand properly without the guidance of parents and other experienced adults. When boys enter their puberty, they often start taking interest in abstract concepts and subjects such as justice, politics and arts. They also begin to understand the world around them, planning out a life for themselves, having dreams and life goals to fulfill.

Along with a very new view of life and sense of self comes anxiety and confusion. Boys in their puberty develop a strong sense of personal identity. Therefore, they often try to get attention from others to prove themselves. They are also curious about the adult world. Sometimes, they can be misled by the negative things from the world around them. For example, boys start to smoke or drink because they are curious and they think they are cool to do so. They make a lot of friends and from peer groups. They may have good friends and they may not be mature enough to identify bad ones. In short, this is a period of experiencing new things and new people, both the good and the bad.

It is crucial that parents are ready for the changes of their boys so that they can help their boys go through this period. A cozy home environment where adolescents can stay comfortable and share their feelings and experience is important. Parents should be sensitive to provide reasonable guidelines. Force and punishments are not highly recommended in this phase as adolescents tend to be rebellious.
