Sweeping social changes have recently left profound influence on the Vietnamese family life in the past years, especially in big cities.

More women go to work now and many of them can even hold higher positions and get better-paid jobs than their husbands. Though it is good that women can now have more social life than they used to, they have to work harder - both in the workplace and at home. While they have to carry out household duties traditionally done by a housewife, they have as well to fulfil their roles at work like their male colleagues.

Meanwhile, many husbands do not seem to be ready for the new roles they must play in modern family life. They might be happy to fix things in the house such as plumbing and electricity problems and even cooking and washing but they would not embrace the idea of taking care of children. Consequently, in the majority of cases, that heavy lifting still remains much more on the shoulder of the wife.

The problem of sharing the housework tends to become worse in families where the wife is busier at work and the husband has smaller income that he can contribute to the family budget. By and by and sooner or later, there will be serious tension in the marriage if the husband refuses to give a helping hand when it comes to the house chores.

No doubt, social changes have redefined the roles of men and women.
