Between Zoos and Sanctuaries

Should we keep endangered species in zoos? Animal rights advocates are against keeping animals in zoos as this violates their rights to live freely in their own natural environment. On the other hand, sanctuaries rescue animals that cannot live in the wild and can only survive in captivity. This includes animals that are injured and exotic pets that are returned by their owner.

Both zoos and sanctuaries confine wild animals. They confine animals in pens, tanks and cages. In sanctuaries, animals are confined within a space. Many are operated by non-profit organisations, display animals to the public and educate the public about animals. Some charge admission or request a donation from visitors.

The main difference between zoos and sanctuaries is how they acquire their animals. A zoo might buy, sell, breed or trade animals, or even capture animals from the wild. The rights of the individual animals are not considered. Animals are often overbred because zookeepers like having a constant supply of baby animals to attract the public. Zoo patrons expect to see lively, active animals, not old, tired animals. Overbreeding leads to overcrowding. Excess animals may be sold to other zoos and circuses.

A sanctuary does not breed, buy, sell or trade animals. It does not capture animals from the wild but acquire animals that are injured or can no longer survive in the wild.

Endangered species are animals that are declining rapidly because they are about to vanish. Putting these animals in the zoo is not the solution to the problem. The key is in protecting its habitat. We should protect endangered species because extinction is a tragedy. It is an environmental problem because other species suffer when they become extinct.

Part 4

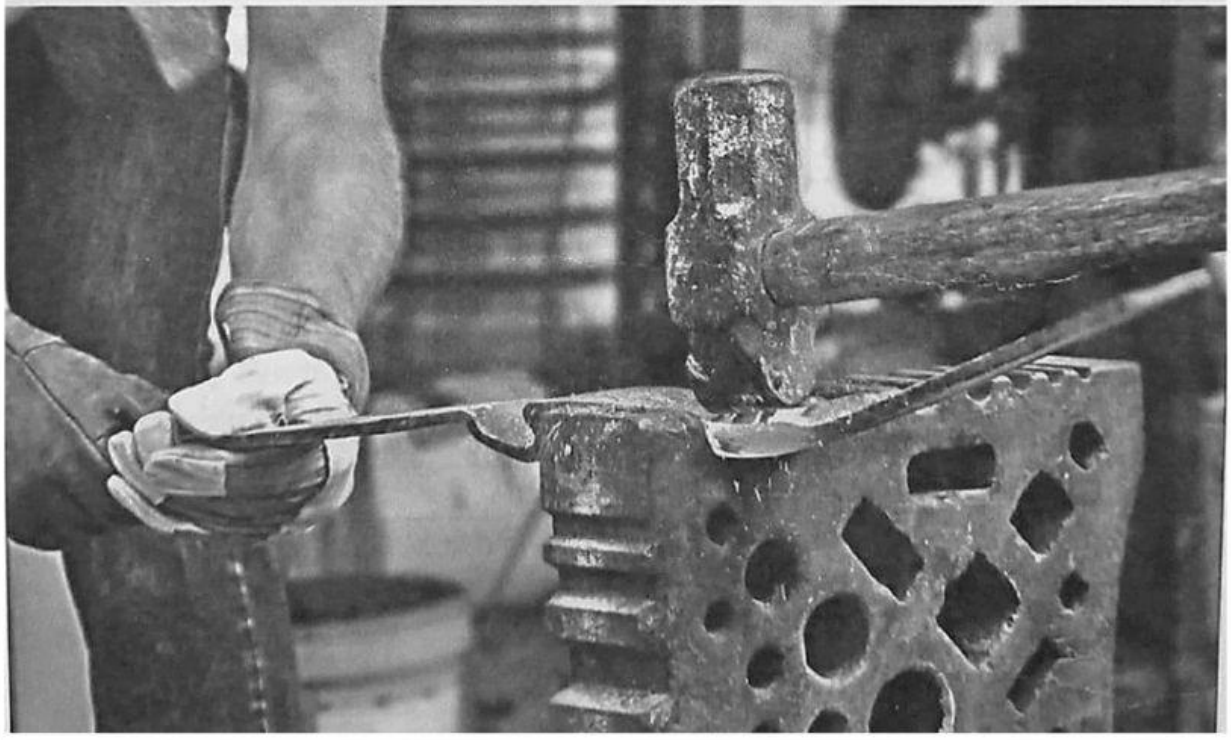

Read the text below and answer questions 25 to 34

Chung Hwa Kiam is a third-generation immigrant blacksmith. He is always busy at his shop making knives, parangs, axes and many more items. His muscular arms effortlessly hammer hot iron into the desired shapes. Chung Hwa Kiam learnt the skill from his father. He believes that the trade and blacksmithing skills will end with him as none of his children seem interested in following in his footsteps.

Today, at 72, Chung can afford to retire comfortably. He owns the shop he works in and the modest bungalow he lives in with his wife and unmarried youngest son. However, life for Chung was not always so prosperous. He had to stop schooling because he was required to help out with his father's blacksmithing business. He started working for his father at a very young age. At about ten years of age, he was strong enough to carry the heavy hammer used to pound the hot iron. He patiently learnt blacksmithing skills from his father. In the evenings, he learnt business skills from him. His father always told him never to let opportunity pass him by. Then, by nightfall, they would retire for the day. The run-down shop his father operated also doubled up as their home.

Chung's father made several wise business decisions and investments. The family prospered. Chung's own children – he has seven – have all been educated to university level. They are busy pursuing careers in law, medicine, engineering and information technology. They have given up asking him to retire and take it easy.

"What would I do? I only know how to be a blacksmith," Chung is fond of telling his children whenever they broach the subject.
