Topic: What is the origin of some traditional food?

The Origin of Yahuarlocro

Yahuarlocro is a thick potato soup prepared with different kinds of potatoes as well as sheep gut and blood. The word locro comes from the "Quichua" word lugru, which means "potato soup", and yahuar means "blood". Locro is prepared with a variety of ingredients such as beans, corn, spinach, and other vegetables.

Yahuarlocro is certainly one of the most emblematic dishes in our country and its origin seems misterious. Many scholars have done research about it and there are some theories about the history of this delicious dish. In the oldest recipe books, there's no information about this soup, although many other traditional preparations and ingredients were registered. This shows that yahuarlocro may have been served only at farms and countryside fairs. Sheep arrived to Quito in the XVI century, so the use of it in the recipe may have started at that time in farms and little towns.

Nowadays it is served with onion salad, avocado, and sheep blood. Many people enjoy this soup and other traditional dishes in restaurants as well as at markets.
