

P6 Practice Paper 10

Comprehension

Have you ever wondered who was the first person to write an English dictionary? The first dictionary, written by Doctor Samuel Johnson, grew into a pillar of the English language. It is now almost impossible to study or work without the use of a dictionary.

Dictionaries are mainly used to ensure accuracy of the meaning and spelling of words. Oxford, Longman's, Chambers and Websters are only a few of the dictionaries available in the market. From the invention of the first language dictionary, other dictionaries followed so as to include those for occupations, pictorial, pronunciation and translation of languages. Translation dictionaries which provide the meaning of words in two languages are now available in just about every conceivable language. There are also dictionaries on idioms and proverbs and reverse dictionaries. A reverse dictionary provides the meaning of a word, and the user has to look for that word.

In Singapore, the dictionary is introduced to students as early as in primary 2 so that they get to know its importance. Most people continue to use the dictionary past their school days.

Modern dictionaries give both the meanings and pronunciation of words so that we can learn to spell or pronounce difficult words. In fact, there are some dictionaries that focus on the pronunciation of words.

Dictionaries enable people to sharpen their verbal and written skills thus improving their personal as well as business communication with others. Recently, the use of electronic dictionaries are enabling people who speak diverse languages to communicate with one another. For instance, a person only needs to type a word in one language, and the dictionary spells out the word in a different language for the other person to read.
