READING: Read this article and do tasks A and B	5 x 0.2 = 1 mark

A
Critics and social commentators have agreed that the age of the hero is over. In the past people had heroes. They were the most prominent figures in the public consciousness - people who had achieved great things, people who had done great deeds - proud, noble leaders and bold pioneers.

B
The myth of the hero, though, could not survive when public life came to be dominated by the mass media. The mass media killed off the heroes and replaced them with celebrities. To become a celebrity what matters is not so much the greatness of what you have done but the exposure you are given in the media. A democratic culture also undermines the idea that certain individuals carry a divine spark and are therefore, in a category superior to that of the rest of us.

C
Celebrities offer exclusive stories to increase their exposure, the media promote them to increase their ratings, and as a result we pay so much attention to the glossy features, the exclusive interviews, and the various scandals and intrigues. They have no reason to object to invasions of their private lives because this just keeps their names on everyone's lips, which is all that really matters.

D
For many people, the heroes of the past were an inspiration, they broadened our horizons by giving us an example of a course of action that could be considered noble. Celebrities, on the other hand, with the stories about their hardships and their lucky breaks, their affairs and their break-ups, prove to be nothing out of the ordinary. Reading about their lives does not inspire us or fill us with purpose. If it isn't just an idle diversion - a way of killing time - it may well help us to resign ourselves to our own sense of purposelessness.

Task A Match the heading to the paragraph. There are two extra headings.

1	Any Private Issue Counts
2	Celebrities and Heroes' Coexistence in Today's World
3	The Past Better than the Present?
4	The End of an Era	A
5	Celebrities and Their Interesting Private Lives
6	A New Era

Task B Find words in the text that mean:

1 successfully did something (verb) _____

2 difficult moments (noun) _____
