Hughie was one of those whom you would call an aristocrat. Yet he was in no relation to business and prosperity. Why, in the circles where he was welcome it was believed that this nice and properly brought up gentleman had nothing to do with profit and earning money. Hughie's father had left him his cavalry sward and a collection of Shakspeare's works, so the young man now could _____30 only $200 a year. It was not much in the society where a diamond pin for the tie was a nice little trifle, absolutely necessary to receive invitations to lunches and dinners. Hughie was only a young man with a perfect profile and no profession.

That's why he had to be as cunning as a fox to pretend he led the same way of life his friends did. To make matters _____31, he was head over ears in love. He thought his object to be a new Venus, a paragon of grace and beauty, a goddess. The girl he loved was the daughter of a _____32 Colonel who had lost his health _____33 India. Laura - this was the girl's name, and the passionate lover found it very poetic - and Hughie adored each other "as Romeo and Juliet". This expression the girl pronounced with a very special expression on her fresh face and iron affirmation in her angel-like voice. It was lucky that the Colonel was very fond of Hughie. Yet he wouldn't hear of any engagement. "Come when you _____34 ten thousand", he used to say. As you see he had set his mind so that his daughter would never suffer from the lack of food or clothes. He also believed that a thick wallet is the best husband. "Then we will see _____35 it", he said again and again. And Hughie _____36 very gloomy after it, and had to go to Laura for consolation.
