Reading

Environmental art at its best

Andy Goldsworthy is a British artist, sculptor, and photographer who uses things that he finds in the natural world to make his art. He uses colorful flowers, snow, ice, sand, rocks, and anything he can find in nature to make his original outdoor sculptures and works of art. He creates his artwork in beautiful natural places, such as forests, mountains, lakes, or beaches. He has created artwork in the U.K., Japan, Australia, the U.S., Canada, and many other countries.

Andy only uses his hands, and the natural things that he finds, when he makes his sculptures. His art only lasts for a few weeks, days, or hours. Some of his art pieces slowly disappear because he makes them only with natural products and always leaves them outside. His work might be a delicate sculpture that he makes with flowers or pieces of ice, or an enormous sculpture made with rocks.

Andy wants to understand nature by working with it. He enjoys working with his hands and being outside in different types of weather: rain, sun, wind, or snow. He doesn't want his work to last, because the natural world is always changing. This is an important part of his work; he wants people to understand that many things in life do not last.

So he takes photographs of his sculptures just after he has finished making them. His photographs are as important as his sculptures because they are the only way that most people can see his work. Andy feels that if he moved his sculptures into a gallery, they would lose their meaning.
