Reading

2. Read the article about identity. Decide if the statements are true (T), false (F) or not mentioned (NM).

A New Identity Every Week!

Imagine having a job where you have to take on a new identity every week or month! That's what actors do. For every play or film, they have to become a different person, often with a different personality and different appearance. One week they're kind, generous and blonde, and the next week, they're tall, thin and arrogant! So, how do they do it? And do it so well?

Actors think about acting their new characters in different ways. Some, like the famous Robert De Niro, want to 'live' the role. They learn everything they can about the new person they are going to become. Then they do everything their character would do. They dress the same, they eat the same things, they talk in the same way and even try to walk like them. The idea is to start 'thinking' like the new character. And they don't behave like this only in the studio or on stage, but they take the character home as well! That must be difficult for the rest of the family! Who's going to be at breakfast with us today – Al Capone, the President of the USA, Jack the Ripper??

Other actors create their characters in different ways. Some say that changing their appearance helps them to become the new person. Costume and make-up are very important, but some actors do even more to change their appearance. Some actors eat a lot to become fatter for some parts – like Renee Zellweger in the Bridget Jones films and then diet to get thin again for the next film! Some grow their hair long or even go bald! Some really good actors can make us believe that they're taller or stronger than they really are just by the way they act. Others need a bit of help – like Tom Cruise in his high shoes, or Robert Redford, who sometimes had to stand on a box because he's quite short!

The best actors are the ones who don't take their own personality with them into the role. They take on the new identity completely and we don't think of the actor, but of the character. Heath Ledger, who died in 2008, was like this. He could change so completely that we don't immediately think 'oh that's Heath Ledger!' He could be handsome, ugly, blonde or dark. He could be clever, stupid, funny or serious. He was a master at changing identity.

Actors have a difficult job and I admire them a lot. Personally, I think it's quite enough to have just one identity!

- a. Actors usually try to think like the new character. ____
- b. Some actors spend time with the people who they are trying to copy. ____
- c. Actors sometimes have weight problems because of the stressful life. ____
- d. Actors might be shorter than we think. ____
- e. Not recognising an actor is a good thing. ____
- f. The writer of the article would like to be an actor. ____
