I think traditional medicine is the quickest and most effective method of treatment. I had a person experience of the ten years ago when I was in the USA on holiday. I had a minor heart attack and the doctor prescribed some medicine. However, after six months there was no improvement at all. Then one day, I read an article about the Neem tree which has been used in China for four years. The Chinese use its seeds and leaves to treat pain in the bones and joints. The article said that a scientist had discovered that oil from the tree's roots could also be used to treat attacks. I used it for a month and could immediately see the difference. It was amazing! I would like to encourage other heart attack patients to use it, too.

I also have another personal experience of both modern and traditional treatments, and I think that traditional medical treatment is the quickest and most effective way to cure illness.

Let me give you an example. I was cycling in the mountains when I crashed into a big rock and injured my leg. My father took me to the hospital and they kept me there for two days to treat my wound but the wound had got worse. The next morning my grandmother used herbs to treat the wound. After she cooked these herbs, she put the mixture on my leg. It was boiling hot! I couldn't sleep from the pain but it was so wonderful and my wound got better soon. I later found out that traditional medicine is better than modern one.
