I know people association Japan with digital technology, but they've got some pretty strict ideas about mobile phones. Japanese people are very sensitive to noise - drivers rarely hoot and people never shout in public. That's why text messaging is extremely popular there. Talking on mobile phones is prohibition on public transport, but they don't switch their phones off. Instead, passengers break the monotony by sending messages, playful games or using the Internet. Sometimes you see businessmen who are ignorance the rules because they are afraid of missing out on a deal. People who object to this can get so annoyed that they'll expression their disapproval by tapping their feet loudly until the call is over! It's very funny to see.
